The Trinacria: The original Greek name for the island of Sicily is Trinacria (Tre which means three and Nacria which means promontory), meaning the island of three points.

From the times of Homer, the island has been described by its distinct triangular shape. The points are considered to be Capo Peloro at Messina in the northeast, Capo Passero in the southeast, and Capo Lilibeo at Marsala on the west coast.

The Trinacria is represented as a Medusa-like woman with three legs in a running position. The three legs point in the direction of Sicily's three promontories, since the island is said to "rest on three legs." This symbol is derived from the Greeks who colonized the island in the 8th century BC.

Mt. Etna: Sicily's greatest natural attraction is also its highest mountain. To the ancient Greeks, Mount Etna was the realm of Vulcan, god of fire, and the home of the one-eyed monster known as the Cyclops. At approximately 3350 meters, it is Europe's highest active volcano. The height of its summit changes with each eruption, and over the centuries a few lava flows have reached the coast. Over 1200 square meters of Etna's surface is covered with solidified lava. Etna offers skiing in the winter months and breathtaking hikes in the woods during the summer. There are also a number of smaller peaks on the slopes of Etna, and some interesting caverns. Since Etna is a strato volcano, with relatively cool lava temperatures and numerous openings (vents), nobody ever knows precisely where on its vast surface the next eruption will be. Etna's long recorded history has proven invaluable to the world's volcanologists.
